

Studies of super-heavy nuclei require a recoil separator which separates heavy reaction products from an intense beam, sometimes measures their mass number, and focuses them for further characterization. Properties of existing and planned separators for studies of super-heavy nuclei will be compared. Important design considerations for such a recoil separator will be discussed.